The purpose of the present study was to investigate the gross, histological and ultrastructural features of the secretory portion of the peribranchial gland (peribranchial gland duct) of male octopods from three colonies (the middle and the surface of one male octopus), with different social experience levels: The first colony consisted of one female and two male octopuses in a large (7,000 L) and a smaller (1,250 L) aquarium. The second colony consisted of one male and four females. The third colony consisted of two males and 12 females. The results showed that the peribranchial gland ducts of octopods from the three colonies were filled with numerous secretory cells, and had a similar gross structure. In all the colonies, the cells were filled with dark granules and rough endoplasmic reticulum, and contained few vacuoles and secretory vacuoles. The two types of peribranchial gland ducts between the incipient males and females were also well developed and filled with numerous secretory cells. However, the highly developed secretory portion of peribranchial gland duct between the cohabiting males of colony three had secretory cells that were fewer in number, containing fewer granules and fewer secretory vacuoles. It is concluded that the secretory portion of the peribranchial gland is more highly developed in octopods from colony three than in octopods from colony one. It is also likely that the secretory cells are larger in size and more active in colony three than in colony two. Interaction of uncoated and coat-coated polystyrene particles with mammalian cells. The effect of different surfaces on the toxicity of polystyrene particles was evaluated by direct interaction with and following internalization by human fibroblast and embryonic kidney cells. Particles with different surface properties (coating and purity) and concentration were evaluated for cytotoxicity. Although adherence to the extracellular matrix occurred to a greater extent for uncoated particles, internalization of uncoated polystyrene latex increased as particle concentration increased. Both uncoated and coated polystyrene
