Seventy one patients with diabetes mellitus and neurological manifestations have been observed. The onset of neuropathy is very variable: it often occurs in the presence of hyperglycaemia, in some patients it is not present in mild diabetes. Neuropathy is rarely the initial sign of diabetes mellitus. In the absence of associated retinopathy the incidence of neuropathy and pseudoneuropathy is higher in the males than in the females. Among the various types of neuropathy, the diabetic polyneuropathy is the most common and often the most disabling, and it is the leading cause of non-traumatic sensorimotor polyneuropathy in patients over 45 years of age. The polyneuropathies secondary to diabetes are more often asymmetrical and of an electrophysiological nature. This impairment of large myelinated nerve fibres is most likely to be accounted for by diffuse axonal degeneration. The most frequent symptoms are painful and sensitive polyneuropathy. These symptoms are also the leading cause 1cb139a0ed
