Lethal Planet is a survival game set in a high-tech future where mankind has discovered how to use matter from other dimensions. As a result, they have evolved into living dimensions. These dimensions are known as Dominions. Players can use these powers in two ways: to harness a Domain's power in their own games (the Ascension) or to convert others' dimensions to their own (Rashguard). Three domains have been assigned to each player. Your realm is the largest and most powerful of the three, while the other two are much smaller and less advanced.Players start the game in possession of one of each type of Domain, each of which has a different skill.

A Dominion comes with three 'parts' which are used to improve your skills. The first 'part' is the gauntlet which enhances your strength, the second part is a set of magnetic shoes that increases your speed and the last part is a special mask that boosts your dexterity. Domains can be obtained throughout the game and some are more expensive than others. You can buy them using a currency called gems. This system also works to unlock new levels and play other modes.Players use a single weapon called a ray gun which allows them to fight enemies and find other players. Each Dominion has two effects which can be activated when they are equipped. Players can be enhanced in their own Domains and can even combine these Domains in their own games to make their ray gun attack stronger.Getting your hands on your own Domains is a big part of the game and players can do this by going to a number of different portals. Players can then gather resources for their Dominion and find new Dominions on other worlds. Once you have gathered enough gems and resources, you can use them to buy your own Dominion. During Ascension, a process which involves transforming minerals into gems, players can collect over 400 different items which are then exchanged at auction houses for Dominion upgrades and other items. Players can also find items such as survival vests in the wild. Hi, my name is Kristan and I'm a gaming addict! As the title points out, I'm probably going to talk about Half-Life 2's ending here, since it's on topic, but I'm not the best fan of the game, either. It gave me some moments of indescribable sadness, after all. And it felt like the whole hype and expectations were about to reach their peak at the year 2000, so I couldn't help but wonder why Valve didn't announce it sooner. Furthermore, it took them that many years to do it, in a perfectly respectable way. I don't want to make a case by case compare-and-contrast of how the following events relate to the DLC movies, since most of the main elements are coming from the game (originally released over ten years ago): - The game was really smooth and made good use of its graphics (and its story) in its opening and ending. - The game always felt like a First Person Shooter, so much so that it was incredibly close to a 40-60 FPS experience when it was released in 1999; something that raised some good debate on RPS about framerates (which ended up being taken by their editor [Penumbra]'s very nice article), but which made me cry over and over again. - The game has always felt divided by the good guys and the bad guys, with a generally accepted "main villain" - a sort of Otto-like figure for the team of Section 9, enemies for the Combine, an enemy for Gordon, etc. - the only thing that always stuck with me being that the Lysol guy made the perfect bad-guy-type character. - The exploration aspect was deeply and deeply ingrained in the story and design, as was the lack of a "center point" object until Gordon's first encounter with the scientists at the end (that change makes you feel the importance of being that one guy that goes into that building or doesn't), as well as the importance of approaching the puzzles from multiple angles. - No Half-Life character didn

Connect with us on: Facebook: ...why not?i dont think google is too good of a company. they take and sell everything...if they take mail servers, search engines, chat apps, messaging apps, email apps, and even message boards, can they really make money off of ALL of these products? i don't know why they're using that. what's the point of doing it? i don't know, i don't know what the intentions behind it are. but from my perspective, it's pretty close to a stockholm syndrome. While the software and web applications are definitely useful, they come at the expense of the open web. We can't have open web apps in android since the manufacturers are for the most part non-playful about the in-app restrictions (the endless number of apps being the only exception). And the users of those apps feel the pain. Plus it doesn't matter if those applications are open source or not, they're still going to come at a price. Open web apps are not free and nor should they be. I'm also not a fan of the running of the OS. I would really like a more open, more truly free mobile OS. It sucks when google does stuff like this to the web, and then gets mad at Mozilla about running their search (bigger search than Google), and then tries to bring back search in chrome. Here's a idea. Google holds off on creating an android browser and just uses the webkit one. Then when it's complete, and the browser is finished, and they just want to hold off on releasing an Android version of it
