Standardisation and quality control in laboratory medicine is becoming an important issue. The implementation of standard formats for clinical chemistry and hematology is being promoted by the International Federation of Clinical Chemistry and Laboratory Medicine (IFCC). Standard formats for classical biochemical analyses are being adapted to those with the aid of magnetic beads. In addition, a number of applications require the evaluation of the reproducibility of test results. Methods are presented for the evaluation of the precision of test results derived from different instruments. Patient-controlled analgesia and the elderly patient. Control over one's own pain relief is important to elderly patients, yet the use of patient-controlled analgesia (PCA) is increasing and various misconceptions exist about the use of PCA. Using a postal questionnaire, the effect of age on the use of PCA was measured in a sample of 1200 elderly patients referred to a geriatric clinic. Only 49% of these patients reported using PCA as opposed to 70% of over-65 patients in an earlier study. In addition, patients over 75 years old were less likely to use PCA and the numbers in this age group were in contrast with those in a previous survey. The level of educational attainment of those who had used PCA was significantly lower than that of a matched control group. Similar results were obtained when the effect of gender was also examined. Patients who use PCA for their own relief are more likely to do so if they have a greater educational background and are female.
