Although a basic video is often easy to do, there are certain things to consider in order to have the best video possible. Here's what I'd suggest you do. 1) Assess your needs. First, be certain that you have the needs that a video will address. You may be tempted to do a video that is over the top in what it shows (as opposed to what it says), and be overly dramatic, for example. This is important because in the end you may just be making a video that does not address the real issue. 2) Think about what you want it to say. Is it going to be a video that addresses the issue of how to make better choices in your life? Is it going to be a video that promotes a product? Or, is it going to be a video that just shows you someone doing something cool? If you are unsure of how to best use the video, you need to have clarity here. 3) Have a video script. Now that you have an idea of what you want to say, write it out in a clear way. This will give you an idea of what the video will contain and will be a lot easier to write and produce than a free-form video with the camera rolling.
