submandibular gland. He was treated with cyclosporine for 7 years, and the tumor was detected when he was 32 years old.

We believe this case to be the first reported case of clear cell carcinoma associated with long-term cyclosporine therapy. Cyclosporine treatment may cause this rare malignant tumor of the salivary gland. The present invention relates to visual pattern recognition and, in particular, to an improved method of normalizing the appearance of an image, such as a face image, for purposes of visual pattern recognition. A computer system can be used to perform automated facial recognition (AFR) that is designed to identify individuals by their facial appearance. AFR is widely used in various security applications for customer service. AFR can also be used to reduce fraud in automated teller machines (ATMs) and automatic check-out (A.C.O.T.) machines. In ATM fraud, thieves often use a picture or digitized image of the persons' face to pass checks. In A.C.O.T. fraud, thieves often use a picture or digitized image of the person's face to take more credit than they are entitled to. AFR can also be used to provide security in motor vehicle access (e.g., automated access of garages and parking lots). AFR is difficult due to the existence of individual and environmental variations such as face expression and lighting, different facial features and angles, photo blur and the like. Various techniques are being used to address individual and environmental variations in face recognition. For example, artificial neural networks can
