Regulation of dorsal root reflexes in the spinal cord of rats during the feeding response: an in vivo and in vitro study. The suppression of dorsal root reflexes elicited by periventricular electrical stimulation in the rat by the ingestion of a liquid meal was studied. In vivo experiments demonstrated that, in unrestrained and chronically prepared rats, reflexes evoked by dorso-lateral periventricular electrical stimulation were consistently suppressed at the earliest stage of meal ingestion. No significant suppression of the reflex was observed after ingestion of a glucose or water solution. In vitro experiments showed that in the spinal cord dorsal root neurons evoked by dorso-lateral periventricular stimulation were consistently inhibited. These observations confirm the in vivo findings and demonstrate that the suppression of reflexes elicited by periventricular electrical stimulation is associated with the ingestion of a food solution. The potent inhibition of dorsal root reflexes was due to hypogastric nerve influence and not to the direct effect of a food solution in the spinal cord.

In many cases, to be able to gain the unobstructed view of the person, the head must be raised a substantial distance from the patient's shoulders. Heretofore, adjustable seating units are known and have been used which involve adjustable, scissor-like connectors for adapting the wheel chair to the height of the user.
