Navigation Intended use: The download is for Windows only, but the distribution is multilanguage What about similar software? Conclusion What we have here is a data mining company that's trying to make a name for itself by stealing things from Microsoft. The similarities with the LinkedIn's API leak are stunning. In fact, it's even more brazen, because the one that was caught was just released, while the other is already on the market. If there's one thing the open source community hates more than stealing, it's an illegitimate derivative work. Where do we go from here? Microsoft feels it's important enough to go as far as to put an entire blog post about the situation. Even though the solution is pretty easy, what we're about to talk about will make you think twice before subscribing to a developer's newsletter again. As always, we would like to thank Google Trends. This chart tells us how users search for the topic we're discussing. It can be very useful at times when it comes to understanding changes in the web traffic. The only downside is that it's restricted to the United States only. Who's at fault? A lot of people have been pointing their finger on LinkedIn, but Microsoft's been the real offender for several weeks now. Microsoft released an announcement about the leak that contained a link to a hidden page where they solved the problem in a very easy way. We've already went through that information, so let's analyze what happened afterwards. The consequence was that LinkedIn's API was partially or fully unavailable for more than 8h. It's not known when and how the whole thing started, but the last days of November 2015 became the hotbed of discussions on developer boards like Hacker News and Reddit. Nobody knew what was going on. The first thing that came to our mind was that it's a false positive, but the POST requests were large enough to raise suspicions, so we started
