Adobe has long had a painful experience with browser-based image editing software, but with Photoshop CC 2019, the company is making a big change that is likely to make it easier for many users to migrate from a desktop app. Starting with CS5, Adobe introduced " Photoshop for the web ", which was a fantastic browser-based workflow for photographers. It was even cheaper than Photoshop itself, and as a result, it was appealing to new users as well as pros. In 2016, however, Adobe announced that it was phased out, and in its place, it installed Adobe Lightroom. Most of us know Adobe Photoshop as the software which comes bundled with new computers and laptops. However, after the introduction of this inexpensive device, Photoshop didn't make the leap to its tablets. For better or worse, the iPad Pro is not a computing device. However, if you're a Photoshop user, and your question is whether a cheaper tablet device can replace a dedicated computer for all your Photoshop work, the answer is 'yes'. In a way, this is also a good news for all you laptop users. If a cheaper device can perform Photoshop tasks as well as a notebook, then you can probably now cut down on the number of times you have to rack up your credit card. Speaking mathematically, this is a great idea: it is, after all, better to spend $100 on a book rather than $1000 on an $18,000 computer. I'm kind of new to the editing scene (photoshop/lightroom) and I think I've kind of a fairly decent handle on the file types, file sizes, conversion ratios and so on. But I have a few questions I'm not sure about.
