Adobe Photoshop isn't just a software just for editing pictures, it can be a software for designing as well. The programs are bestseller for the photo editing software group and one of the most powerful tools that Photoshop users use. These are all just issues in Photoshop, not Lightroom. However, they may not be that significant to you, depending on how much you plan to use them. I often use Lightroom for the simplicity and speed of exporting, since that is what I do most often. The same goes for RAW conversion, so for me it makes sense to use Lightroom, which is free. When it comes to raw image editing, however, Photoshop is my software of choice. I know that most people will disagree with me on this one, but that is just fine with me. Adobe is building toward the future in Photoshop Elements, and it is good to see them continue to embrace the program rather than make it more like Photoshop CS6. Together, the two applications would give a more cohesive image workflow, and that is something that no other photo software can offer. (I am thinking specifically about the nature of the manual color profiles and spot removal tools.) While it is a shame that Adobe has not built in a virtual print, I feel that this is not a showstopper. Many other digital fixing tools, such as U Point Cloud v.2.0 and 3Dmax CC 2019 for example, for example have virtual print features already. Of course, print owners would need to make this one as fast as possible, since it will take longer to do it with the tools they know of. However, separate applications that already do this may not suffice either. This is where Adobe seems to get it right.
